I like the new advanced features, such as the black-and-white filter and the ability to add a small blur to an image. I also like that the space-saving (non-destructive) editing works as advertised. But I continue to miss the one major thing that made me switch to Lightroom — the old "save as" feature, which looked up the optimal TIFF compression ratio and over-compressed the image just right so that your files would not take more space than they should ever take. The new "save as" feature (or "save as") compresses pics only minimally — and those pictures end up much larger than the ones before the upgrade! This is just ridiculous, and the people at Lightroom are absolutely clueless about that. Lightroom is doing a great job in many respects, but when it comes to compression of photos, they need to improve a lot. Now you can take full advantage of your web browser and enjoy the convenience of private browsing, without sacrificing security. Beware of any excessive use or over-use of the Adobe brush tool. Like painting with a paintbrush, if you over-do it and over-dip with the brush, your photo editing or graphic design program will not work properly. Over time, the program can slow down and even take longer to complete tasks, leaving you with no choice but to shut down and restart the application. e3d0a04c9c
